

The 300 Men Who Advised the Consuls

A Senate roster-style list of attested Roman Republican office-holders (selected from the consular fasti, 509–31 BC)

Who are the 300 men?

In the Roman Republic, the consuls were advised by the Senate (Senatus) — a standing council of Rome's political elite. Ancient tradition often associates the Senate with a membership of around 300, especially in the middle Republic, although the exact number changed over time.

The Senate did not “vote laws” in the modern sense. Instead, it issued advice and guidance — especially on foreign affairs, war, finances, provincial administration, and religion — usually recorded as senatus consulta. In practice, this advice carried enormous authority.

Important note on names and completeness

No complete, year-by-year membership roll of the Republican Senate survives. For that reason, the list that follows is a practical educational roster of 300 attested men who are safely within the senatorial world because they appear among the Republic's top magistrates — above all as consuls (and in some cases replacement/suffect consuls).

Each entry includes a first attested year (in BC) drawn from the consular lists. The goal is to provide a readable “senatorial name bank” that matches the classic classroom phrase: “the 300 men who advised the consuls.”

How to read the table

No. = index in this 300-name roster • Name = Latin-style abbreviated praenomen + nomen + cognomen
• First attested as consul = earliest year (BC) where the individual appears in consular fasti • Era = Early / Middle / Late Republic.
